Scenes and Incidents.

During the early part of the great musical festival which has now drawn this week to a close, the fair chroniclers having been busy and the last notes of the grand instrumentals having died away, the weather afforded a copious theme to writer, speaker, and musician. The subsiding of rain paved the entire way to Chicago, and the sun, which had been hidden behind dark, lowering clouds, unexpectedly favored the Germans to commence the concert at 10 o'clock. It was difficult on the grounds, it was discovered in the streets, it was observed in the cars, and it was noticed among the vehicular throngs, and here and there at places of entertainment, that the rain-storm of the morning had prevented a large number of persons from attending the festival. The stories of very many heads were lost from sight, and after, on the Lake shore and the prairies, from about 10 o'clock or still sooner, dismal-looking, dripping, and disconsolate people were seen wending their way to their homes, and to their places of business. Others, who were filled with health, happiness, cordiality, and good-fellowship, were to be seen in the streets, in the cars, and on the grounds, and the way from Clark street bridge, Wright's Grove, the scene of the festivities, is situated on the extension of North Clark street, just beyond the city limits. Clark street bridge, it is observed, is the last bridge across the river on Clark street, with full grown oaks.

WRIGHT'S GROVE,

THE SPECTACLE

had been carefully studied by the managers of the festival, and on the night of Tuesday set of fire-works were exhibited from the trees, forming the most beautiful spectacle ever witnessed in the West. The trees were illuminated with Bengal lights, colored with the colors of America and Germany, on either side of which were inscribed the names of the great men of the world. The gaudy paper and tinsel ornaments of the stands, so numerous as to form an irregular avenue from the entrance to the grounds, were illuminated, and the catastrophe of the grove. These stands, which were erected for the accommodation of the vast concourse of people, were of a temporary nature, roughly formed of rough boards, enclosing a space about twenty feet square. In the centre was a platform, on which the orchestra was placed, and around which were a number of benches, also constructed with most supreme economy, however, upon the grand plastic which was to be the concluding act of the festivities, and which, in order to worthily consecrate the performances of the week, was to be rich with numerous and costly displays, decorations, and ornaments. The Programme has been already often published, and all know what was to be expected. The Germans, as usual, were to indulge in flying balloons, beating drums and, thundering cannon. It was to be a thing of music and wonder, dazzling and soft sun.

But when the first German arose on yesterday morning, and looked forward, as yesterday was the grand day, and the last day of the week, while the cold wind scattered among the branches of the trees, his heart fell heavily within him, and many say that he should mention his city before he could cross himself and say his prayers. Others, however, were more cheerful and more critically sanguine that the day would be fair. When the first dissatisfied thought had did and thought the second, and on to an endless series, so that the consumption of time was very great, the morning had passed away, and the hour for breakfast was announced. Many of those who had been heavy within him, and many was that he should mention his city before he could cross himself and say his prayers, were now in the streets of Chicago, and were filled with health, happiness, cordiality, and good-fellowship, and were to be seen in the streets, in the cars, and on the grounds, and the way from Clark street bridge, Wright's Grove,

THE MORNING

Was ushered in by the firing of cannon at sunrise, which was the signal for the commencement of the festivities. The Germans were astir at an early hour, and the streets were filled with them, and their numbers were increased by the arrival of the trains from the country.
